Sometimes It's WHEN You Know or It's WHO You Know

receiving the resulting grades for that. These are the things occupying the minds and lives of UC Davis students during Winter Break. But should something else nudge into the edge of their consciousness — finding a summer job? Unfortunately, it probably should. Like so many other things "these days" (as opposed to when many of us parents were in college), the summer job market is competitive. Much part-time employment in the service industries is occupied by year-round workers making ends meet with a second household jobs. And both high school students and recent college graduates occupy unpaid internships to build the "relevant experience" sections of their respective applications. It is a great idea for students to start checking out the wonderful services UC Davis offers through the Internship and Career Center...

Generation Z Characteristics in the Workplace Current managers and bosses would be wise to learn what makes Gen Zers tick at work. By Robin Reshwan, Contributor LIVE CHILLING AT WORK? Maybe not yet, but with approximately 80 million teens to young adults heading to the American workforce over the next decade, this may become a familiar work expression for leaving video chat apps open with friends or colleagues. Generation Z is a term used to describe people born between roughly 1996 and 2010. Not to be confused with their older, employed millennial colleagues, Gen Zers are either just entering the workforce or still in school. Here are four characteristics to look for in Gen Z interns, entry-level workers and future coworkers...
